

Tale of two counties' doesn't have a neat plot line

Sunday, June 6, 2010

The Washington Post

The editorial described unions' campaign contributions as a corrupting, make-or-break influence on spending decisions -- money that no council or school board member should accept. Public employee unions donated about $12,000 to my last campaign, and some of my council colleagues probably received more. But if The Post thinks $12,000 buys untoward influence and a blind eye to wasteful spending, why was the editorial silent about a far bigger source of money -- developers' contributions? Developers give hundreds of thousands of dollars to candidates; for some, that one industry accounts for half or more of contributions.

The editorial reiterated past Post criticism of candidates who are endorsed by the Montgomery County Education Association and then give money to the MCEA. The money pays for campaign mailings and nothing else -- and again The Post seems to have another set of standards for developers. In 2002, a political action committee created and funded by developers -- and named Citizens for Quality Living to make it seem like a grass-roots effort -- used the tactic to great effect by requiring contributions from its favored candidates, the "End Gridlock" slate, to pay for mailings.

I've displeased the unions more than once, but I like to think that having a working relationship with labor is a good thing -- just as I've developed a working relationship with the development community. We all have to live and work here, and I put a premium on being able to keep doors open.

Marc Elrich, Takoma Park

The writer is member of the Montgomery County Council (D-At Large).

--